Excerpt: . . . of imagination, but admitted that she had an infinite amount of common sense, bordering almost on wisdom. There was only one thing that ever really disturbed her serenity, and that was the loss of time. The phrase that time was for slaves was a flippant remark which she considered almost blasphemous; and the possibility which Annette had sometimes suggested to her--of there being no such thing as time in the next world--was a contingency under which her imagination reeled. Between mouthfuls of her breakfast she opened her letters; glanced over postcards--which were for the most part notifications of different philanthropic meetings; sorted reports, and even found time to look at the headlines of the morning paper. She laid down the last number of the Outlook for the Blind as Annette entered. Annette, she said, theres going to be a meeting of the Fly Commission on...
